Kwesi's objective is to help people be more creative in their careers, creative in the sense of solving problems. It is commonly known if one uses the creative part of their brain they are able to creatively problem solve in other aspects of their life.

If your staff are able to create solutions and solve problems for your customers this will keep your company relevant and vital. If you are not serving your customers' needs above and beyond your competitors you continue to be a competitor and not a leader.

He believes everything that has not been created by nature has been created by men and women. Creativity is not only tied to the arts, creativity is how we evolve, it helps people to reach their full potential.

Kwesi provides bespoke change management packages and corporate Team Architecture (Teambuilding 2.0). He delivers tailor made training because no two companies are the same. The sessions are fun, interactive and focused. The training makes each team and it's members more committed, creative and connected.

Kwesi's understanding of group dynamics and team building is uncanny because of his 15 years of experience as a theatre director and choreographer. He has worked cross culturally throughout his career with professional performers, community groups, young offenders and a range of theatre professionals to Civil Servants.

These experiences enables Kwesi with the skills to quickly identify a groups strengths, weaknesses and possibilities and see the things the majority of other team trainers don't.

As a Director Kwesi has worked with groups who have never met before and coached them to give polished performances by the end of the day because he has built qualities of trust, understanding and a shared vision. These qualities are important in any business.
